Do I have to include a tagline?

I Want To Be Me (part 2)

The Rat tried to post the following message on the 'I Want To Be Me' page:

I don't suppose for one moment you will publish this, though I'd love you to prove me wrong. Anyone reading this site should treat it with extreme caution. If you dare to comment, you risk have them altered to read something completely different. That fact alone should make you question anything you read. Much of the content is factually incorrect. This will be denied and claims will be made that everything can be sourced, but we have already seen at least one post where the author has quite simply made glaring errors which they are unable to find. The errors were mentioned, but despite looking, after failing to find the aforementioned errors, the author resorts to insulting this username. For your own protection, take everything with a pinch of salt and please be wary of commenting, lest they be edited to state something completely different.

He has been bleating arrogantly that the page contains 'glaring errors', implying these are not words written by him. For the record, I stumbled across the post on this site <http://weeklygripe.co.uk> (<http://weeklygripe.co.uk/>) and simply copied exactly what he had written. However, that doesn't seem to be enough for The Rat and he continues to squeak more lies; lies that don't need to be squeaked but I guess he just can't help himself. I have graciously taken the time to compare his post to mine to see if he could endeavour to show the 'glaring errors'. Enjoy.

I posted:

I want to be me. I have a wife, daughter and a brother, but I also have two sisters and a mother; two sisters and an 85 year old mother who would profess to be loving, caring, professional people yet have turned their backs on their disabled brother and son. I don't fit.

This isn't a rant against my family though, it's a rant about the way mental health illnesses are stigmatised. I used to be a high flying Headteacher, highly successful and in charge of a massively oversubscribed school. One day, near the end of one Summer holidays, I cracked. I'd rarely had a day off work, then I had 18 months off before having to take retirement on ill health grounds aged just 40. I suffer with severe depression and anxiety, dissociative fugue states where I wander, taking on other personalities and very recently have been diagnosed with Asperger's Syndrome.

I'm trying to come to terms with the Aspergers diagnosis still, it explains so much of my past, and especially behaviours which since my breakdown have caused me to feel mad, insane, isolated. I have lost everything, my career, my income, my house, but more importantly than any of this I've lost my credibility. Why? Let me explain.

As a direct result of my mental health issues I've been victimised and bullied to an horrendous extent. The bullying has always been over the internet – it's so easy to type evil words to faceless people who you'll never meet. Owners of consumer forums, who profess to care about the vulnerable, have sent me emails encouraging me to commit suicide, offering to 'lend me their Dyson cord as it is nice and strong' and to 'go and play with overhead train cables'. Hardly things anyone would say to someone with a record of attempted suicide and known serious mental health issues. More worryingly when this person then lies about me, his little crowd of devoted members believe blindly, not asking obvious questions for him to corroborate his lies. His bullying, threats and appalling behaviour are brushed under the carpet, they don't 'really' exist – unless, of course, you're on the receiving end of them as a vulnerable, disabled person.

In addition my two sisters and mother have disowned me. This is as a result of one short argument which took place at a very stressful time last June when my father was dying. The stigma attached to my mental health has led to outrageous lies being told of how I tried to attack my sister with a walking stick – witnesses will tell otherwise. The lies were spread around family and friends thus isolating me to such an extent I couldn't even attend my own father's funeral.

Since the Aspergers diagnosis a couple of weeks ago, much was explained and I tried to make contact with one sister again, she wants nothing to do with me. I've tried many times over the past year to 'be allowed' to visit my own 85 year old mother, but she apparently does not wish to see me. I have phone recordings of my sisters telling my mother to hang up on me – one is a Headteacher of a school with a huge percentage of special needs children, the other an ex-Health Visitor and wife of a GP. These are people who should understand, but having a brother who has mental health issues and Autism does not fit into their picture of 'Happy Families', it's more convenient to turn their backs on me and be discriminatory, to stigmatise me.

I wonder how the parents of children at the one sister's school would react if they knew the reality of what she is like. Both discriminate against a disabled brother terribly. The owner of the consumer forum and many of his 'followers' have behaved appallingly, lying, running me down, mocking me, encouraging my death and making threats which have put me in mental hospital.

I'm reasonably intelligent, I must be to have achieved what I did. I worry about the mentally ill who are unable to speak for themselves as eloquently as I may be able to. The system is rigged against us. The public perception is very much against us. The reality is that mental health stigma is very much alive and kicking.

The saying 'Actions speak louder than words' is so very true in this case. It's easy to talk the talk. How many, when push comes to shove, will actually stand alongside those of us who are severely mentally impaired and join us in our fight to end the stigma?

I don't want to be abandoned. I don't want to be bullied. I want to be allowed to come to terms with my life as it is now, and will be for the time I have remaining. I want to be allowed to be me.

So there you have it. 811 words, 4526 characters. Not a single deviation. As I have said time and time again, when you lie as much as this vile character ((c) Andy58), you lose track of what you did and didn't say. It's such a shame.

The comment made previously stands. Perhaps you should read it carefully.

Cauldron Kate is well aware where this was posted – The Weekly Gripe. However, you have problems find YOUR errors. Simply repeating yourself with some pictures of the article changes absolutely nothing.

It is a real shame you could not accept a compliment, but I see why now – it wasn't your own work, though you didn't initially mention this fact of course. You were even complimented for it ha, ha!

If, as stated, this site has been set up in retaliation for the excellent <http://www.labrat.com>, why does it bring in people other than the owner of that site? This seems a little unfair on them.

Who said it was in retaliation? The homepage is clear what this site is about. So do you finally accept that there are no 'blatant errors', seeing as it was you that wrote it?

OK – I refer you back to my initial comment when you made the post. You really are not as smart as you think are you! Not only do you have the uncanny talent of getting bits of a jigsaw puzzle and putting them together to make the totally incorrect picture, but you cannot even spot things which are pretty much pointed out to you.

It's only 811 words you say, yet you still can't spot YOU error(s). Oh dear!

The jigsaw is definitely an accurate picture of you, as it too has a few pieces missing.

We believe arches have played an important part in this person's life. Perhaps you are missing the keystone which enables the entire arch to stand up. Without it, it falls into lots of separate pieces. So just how good is your research?

Why were you posting as Deanna L in the first place and referring to 'my hubby'? What's that all about? I doubt I'll get an answer before 2pm, when you finally manage to peel yourself off the bedsheets, whilst most of us are up early dealing with family or getting ready for work.
